Presidential Candidate, Senator Barack Obama, in his speech "A More Perfect Union" (2008), argues that the people should unite despite of large differences to create a more perfect union by combining their efforts in solving challenges and problems that affects all Americans such as healthcare and education. He supports his claim by first using parallelism to emphasize his plan for America and to give aspiration to the people by reminding them that in unity they can attain a much better future, then establishing ethos to create an image of himself and build connections among his audiences using his background and personal experiences, then applying logos to provide changes and solution by telling the people to fight for themselves and their equality, and finally using pathos to catch the trust and affection of the public by utilizing patriotic preferences. Obama's purpose is to acknowledge the past, work together to improve the system in healthcare, job, and education, and to get the sympathy of the people to be elected as President in order to inspire and unify the culturally diverse people of America to focus on bigger problems and fulfill the true meaning of the constitution that will build hope and greater future for the next generation. He creates a realistic and sincere tone for the citizens of America, but particularly the voters
